Succulents – The Camels of the Garden

Succulents are finally getting the attention they deserve and gardeners are thrilled with the interesting varieties and colors available in garden centers these days. These “camels” have thick, fleshy foliage that holds moisture, so once established they are very drought tolerant and need very little attention. But they will certainly make a statement in the garden. So many succulent varieties are absolutely works of art. They look fantastic in containers and do a marvelous job filling in rock gardens, paths and those challenging dry spots in the garden. And they’re not just for Southern climates. Succulents are fantastic as houseplants, since they can handle arid conditions, or grown as annuals in colder regions.

Exceptional selections this year include the Brakelights® Red Flowering Yucca. The vibrant, brake-light red color is a wonderful contrast to the standard variety, which tends to be pink or salmon colored. Our star Aeonium this year is Tip Top™ with its striking dark burgundy leaves held together in tight clusters, a beautiful addition to any succulent garden.
